Q, q, Latin, Q, q, Ital. 𝔔, q, black English. Concerning the origin, power, and use of this letter, the ancient Latin writers have delivered various opinions to the modern criticks. Some of them took it to be superfluous, and therefore probably were unconcerned about it, how, or whence, it came into their alphabet. Of this number were Nigidius Figulus and Licinius Calvus, who refused to use it at all. Some used c for it indifferently, and writ pequnia, loquuntur, obliquum, and at other times pecunia, locuntur, oblicum, Vid. Silburg de Vet. Rom. Script. Hence some learned moderns finding many words of this kind; and others again judging it to be no letter, but only a combined note of cu, must consequently have supposed vulgar custom, and a shorter way of writing, to have introduced it into the alphabet. Of this number was Pompeius Festus, and long before him Ennius, who writ sometimes cuando, and sometimes quando. Indeed custom at this day allows us to write cocus, hircus, cum, cur, cotidie, and many others, or coquus, hirquus, quum, &c. promiscuously. From such examples, and the frequent changes of each of these into the other, as in coquo, coctum, liqui, lictum, &c. which is no more than an ordinary permutation in letters of the same organ, especially in mutes of the same rank, some have not only affirmed Q to be CV combined as aforesaid, but showed us the separate parts in this figure C<. These writ sometimes, qis, qæ, qid, or cuis, cuæ, cuid, which Vossius approved. Quintilian on the contrary takes the figure of this letter, as well as the power, from K, and seems to think both letters superfluous. As to the figure, it is just as probable as the former; and as to its power, nothing can be proved from that known pun of Tully, Ego quoque tibi jure favebo; because Donatus having informed us that in Cicero's time quoquus was written, it is more probable that he pronounced that word quoque than koke. My arguments for this conjecture are chiefly from Fabius himself, who tells us (Lib. XII. 10.) this letter made syllables harsh; which surely cannot well agree with the sound of k. Besides, he saith in the same place, that Q had a sound unknown to the Greeks (which it certainly had, and for that reason was not adopted into their alphabet, of which more below) and this evidently proves the Romans sounded it not as a k, but very probably as we do. But what neither the ancient writers nor the moderns were aware of, hath not escaped the sagacity of the learned Dr. Littleton, who has deduced the figure, name, and power of this letter from ק. For as from the Hebrew Caph, the Greeks made Kappa, so from koph they formed koppa; but finding they had no occasion for it in their alphabet, gave it a place among their numerals, calling it κοππα ἐπίσημον. For the same reason also, Vau, not being admitted as a letter, found place as a numeral, by the name of Βαῦ ἐπίσημον. On the very same account, tzade, or zade, or as we call it zad, was denied the favour of being a letter, but assigned a proper place in their numbers. This proceeding may plainly be accounted for from the genius of both languages. The Hebrew being harsher, made use of four letters in each rank of the mutes, namely, of two medials in each order; the sound of the one so differing from its neighbour, as the first from the last: the two medials in the first order were ב and ו, or B and V; in the second ג and ק, or G and Q. In the third ד and צ, or D and Z. But the smoother tongue of the Greeks refusing the latter in each order, made them amends suitable to their rank, by placing the first in their units, the second in their tens, and the third in their hundreds. But to proceed, the old Romans, whose language was not perhaps much softer than the Hebrew, though they framed their alphabet from the Greeks, found themselves obliged to restore these numeral marks to the dignity they had enjoyed in the mother alphabet. And thus from Βαῦ, or, which is the same, the Æolian digamma Ϝ made their F, that people alone of all the Greeks having learned that sound; and from the Greek Κόππα their Q. This letter, I observe, the Latins must have sounded quoppa, if the opinion of several ancient and modern criticks may be allowed, who affirm this letter to be taken in purely for the sake of its V, to give it a broader sound, as it is very probable the original ק had in the Hebrew to distinguish it from כ, whence the Greeks had their Κάππα, and mediately the Latins their K. From the third ἐπίσημον Σάμπι, which, as before noted, was the Hebrew tzade, or as we call it, zad, their z was taken, not from the Greek Ζῆτα; for here I am forced to recede from the learned doctor, because the Latin z hath a very hard sound, as the dental צ hath, whereas the Greek ζῆτα was so soft, that Fabius tells us, the Roman orators were obliged to borrow it sometimes from them, to avoid using their own barbarous z, that is the Hebrew צ, which the Greeks had not, Lib. XII. 10. and in the same place will scarce allow ו, that is, F, to have a human sound; which surely is softer than צ; and the opinion he had of our Q, I have shown before. Hence it is evident, that the Latin z is not the Greek ζ; and that the orator dislikes as letters all the three Ἐπίσημα: and the doctor confesses the figure of z comes nearer צ, and the small z nearer to the final ץ, than to the Greek ζ. But to return to our Q. The figure of Q is easily made from C|, by shutting the semicircle, and obliquating the perpendicular line; and C| quoppa, differs not at all from the Hebrew ק, when, in compliance with the western way of writing, it is turned to the right. Thus at length the figure, name, and power of this letter are settled. But whereas the learned doctor roundly affirms the Greeks had formerly this letter; I cannot here but avow my dissent, since it neither appears among the Cadmean letters, nor those since invented, whether necessary or compendiary: besides, he owns the Greeks did not want it. Yea Quintilian further obſerves, that they could not pronounce it, and is angry that ſo broad and harſh a ſound ſhould be taken into the Latin alphabet, which ſo embaſed the Roman, when compared with the Greek, elocution. I ſhould next ſhow its mutual intercourſe with its ſiſter mutes; but I have already made the longeſt preface to one of the ſhorteſt letters, and therefore ſhall only obſerve, that the reſemblance and ſound of this mute is nearer to that of her medial ſiſter G, than to C or K her other ſiſters. For G takes V after her before a vowel, and that ſometimes in the ſame ſyllable, as in lingua, extinguo, &c. as Q always doth: which v, whether it be a vowel or a conſonant, or neither, as Donatus and others have thought, is better ſought in that letter than here. R, r, Greek Ῥ, ϱ, Hebr. ר Resch, from ריש a head, which its figure in some sort represents, in Syriack ריא, Roë, from which comes the Greek Ῥ, Rhô. From this letter the learned Littleton is of opinion that the Latins, whether by mistake, or design, took the figure of their R, as also the smaller r, by curtailing the larger; and that after they had inserted the Hebrew Q, and considered that the figure of the Greek rhô was the very same with their P, for distinction, an appendage, or tail, was added by them to it. But undoubtedly he is mistaken in this part of his conjecture. For we are certain from their monuments still remaining, that the most ancient Greeks had both Ῥ and R in their alphabet: witness the Baudelotian monument, and the pillars of Herodes Atticus, that famous critick and antiquary, vid. Grut. Inscript. p. 27, where we find this form R at least seven times; to omit what both Pliny and Tacitus acquaint us with, that the figure of the Latin letters was almost the same with that of the ancient Greeks. It seems more probable to me, that the Latins observing the Greeks to have two characters for one sound, which they had not in the rest, viz. Ῥ and R, took the former of them into their alphabet for their P, judging this figure most expressive of the power of half the B, as P really is. This easy conjecture if none have made before, must have happened by not observing the ancient Greeks had R as well as P to characterize their rhô. This letter, R, is in the alphabet put last of all her sister liquids, though undeservedly, being in fact, τῶν ἡμιφώνων γενναιότατον, as Dionysius Halicarnass. calleth it; and therefore might pretend to the first place, since, though not fully, yet more of it may be sounded without a vowel than any of the rest. Add to this, that in the Greek tongue it makes a syllable pure, and takes before it an aspiration: both which privileges belong to vowels. But whether the aspiration ought to be sounded before, or after, this letter, is not agreed on: reason, and the custom of the Æolians, who sometimes prefixed ϝ and sometimes β before it, make for the former opinion; and the use of the Latins, who write rhamnus, rhetor, rhinoceros, rhombus, &c. may seem to countenance the latter. But I observe that in words of Greek extraction the Latins often neglected this aspiration, as in radix, rigeo, rosa, and in other words either omitted or inserted it at pleasure, as in raphanus and rhaphanus, romphæa, or rhomphæa. The Hebrews gave this letter the right of a guttural, never doubling it at at all; and indeed this sound is formed in the upper part of the throat, but so vibrated by a quaver of the tongue, and allision on the teeth, that it makes a sound like the grinning of a dog, whence it is called the canine letter: but the Romans, on the contrary, give it so soft and lisping a sound, that in writing they sometimes omitted it, calling the Etrusci Thusci, or Tusci; and especially before s; thus Ennius writ prosus, rusus, for prorsus, rursus: which is less to be wondered at, because the most ancient Latins doubled not their consonants. Yea, the sound of this lisped r was so near that of its neighbour s, that they writ asa, casmen, Papysii, for ara, carmen, Papyrii; and we find the termination os, as well as or, in good writers still, particularly in the prince of poets, where arbos and honos frequently occur; and labos, vapos, &c. in others. But the soft sound of this letter is in nothing more plain, than in its interposition to hinder the collision of two vowels, as if it had been little more than a breathing; as in murex, nurus, from μύαξ, νυὸς. But to proceed: Though the grammarians call all the liquids immutables, they are often changed reciprocally into one another; and to say nothing of the rest here, this has not only an intercourse with the sisterhood, but often with several of the mutes. First with her sister l, as from puer comes puera, puella; from κανθήλιος, cantherius; and as cælulius was anciently written for cæruleus, so on the contrary we find latiaris for latialis. With her sister m the instances are more rare; but common enough with n: for as from δῶρον and πλήρης are formed donum and plenus, so from μόνος Æol. μένος, and from μόνα, come merus and mora. In some words r and n are written indifferently, as in æreus, or æneus. I will instance as briefly as I can the intercourse of this liquid with some of the mutes: and first with c, as in paucus from παῦρος; with d, as in corium from κώδιον, meridies from medidies, querquedula for querquerula, from querquerus. Anciently also ar in many words was used for ad, as in arlabi, arfinis, arversus; for adlabi, &c. Lastly it is used with g, as from ἄγνη comes agna, serere from seges. This letter is used by poets in describing motion, noise, indignation, or violence, Vid. Voss. Inst. Orat. 4, 2. R. A.

S The Latin capital is taken with very little, or no, variation from the ancient Greek alphabet, and is at least of as great antiquity, as that of the Scythian bow (Σ;) and from this drawn into a smaller form is made s, which is used only as a final both in Greek and Latin, except in the compendiary note ϛ for στ. The Greeks have another, but less, ancient figure of this letter, viz. C, from which the smaller initial and medial ϲ is sometimes used. The Scythian bow is taken from the Phœnician alphabet without variation; as that is from the Hebrew שׂ sin, by drawing it in a jacent, instead of an erect, form. Hence the Dorians, who perhaps immediately received it from the Hebrews, as Herodotus and Pindar acquaint us, called this letter σὰν san, though the Ionians called it σίγμα sigma, from the Chaldean סימכא simcha, by transposing the second and third letters: which opinion is made more probable by the small form of the Greek sigma σ, it being no other than the Hebrew ם turned to the right hand in complaisance to the western way of writing. But there are strong reasons to think ס samech only a secondary letter, substituted for שׂ sin, the better to distinguish it from שׁ schin; wherein they had done wisely, provided they had exterminated שׂ sin, which now seems supernumerary, because both these letters שׂ and ס, have one and the same sound, as appeareth from the Ephraimitish pronunciation of Shibboleth. And hence we may account for the different Greek names of this letter, san being so called from sin, before samech was introduced; and sigma from samech, after such introduction. But to proceed: the Greeks admit this letter into no class in the distribution of their alphabet, whether in honour to it, as being invested with a despotick power peculiar to itself, or in dishonour, looking upon it only as a substitute and attendant on the rest, is uncertain; but I should think the latter, since its servile offices are so very many in declining their nouns, and their verbs more especially in conjugating. For in all future tenses of verbs baryton, and all the tenses derived from thence, with their participles in every conjugation, voice, and mode, this letter is servile; being explicit, implicit, or potential, in them all. And this servile use probably may have been the reason why some among the Greeks have accounted it only an aspiration; in which number was Plato the philosopher, who calls it the breathing letter. And indeed we find both the Greek spirits changed into this letter: the lenis, as in εἰμὶ sum, ὀπὸς succus; the aspirate more frequently, as in ἅλς sal, ἕξ sex, ἑπτὰ septem. This may likewise have occasioned the neglect of it by the Romans in taking words from the Greeks, as in tego, fallo, from ςέγω, σφάλλω, and sometimes in derivatives of their own, as in pumex from spuma. Certain it is, that some learned men among the Greeks avoided a frequent use of it. Plato and Eubulus, two comick poets, made sport in the theatre with this verse of Euripides, Ἔσωσα σ' ὡς ἴσασιν Ἑλλήνων ὅσοι. Yea Pindar was so unjustly severe, that he writ several odes without it: and the whole Spartan nation preferred the canine snarl of Ῥ to the serpentine hiss of s. The Romans also melted it so much, especially in the end of words, as scarcely to be heard; insomuch that even in writing before the interrogative ne, the comick poets neglect it, as in audin'? credin'? dabin'? for audisne, &c. and Virgil avoided ending a word with this letter, and beginning the following word with the same, as, Despectus tibi sum, nec qui sum, quæris, Alexi; orators also forbid this in their compositions. Yea the ancient poets, in imitation of the Greeks, when they pleased, cut it off in the end of a word before a short, and sometimes even before a long, syllable in the following word, as is manifest in that of Ennius, Egregiè cordatus homo catu' Ælius Sextus. And not only Ennius, Nævius, and Pacuvius do this, but Catullus; and even Cicero hath not altogether denied himself the liberty. But though in general this sound may seem to have been unpleasant to both nations, it has without doubt in its proper place its particular graces, and the most that is said against it regards chiefly its too frequent, or improper, use. The Latins, in making some Greek words denizens of Rome, prefix this letter, as in scribo, smaragdus, stella, from γράφω, μάραγδος, τέλλω; and even st anciently, as in stlitem, stlocum, and that too in words of their own tongue: sometimes they interpose it, as in discus, musca, from δίκω, μυῖα. The Greeks also in Latin names of men ending in a add this letter, as Νεμᾶς, Φιμβρίας, for Numa, Fimbria. In Tully's time, and a while after, this letter was doubled, as in caussa, cassus, for causa, casus, vid. Quint. 1, 7. In conjugating Latin verbs, it is substituted for almost all the consonants, as in arsi from ardeo, tersi from tergeo, vexi for vecsi, from veho, vulsi from vello, pressi from premo, posui from pono, repsi from repo, torsi from torqueo, ussi from uro, versum from verti, as grammarians observe; but this to me seems not so much a substitution, as a servile formative power given it in Latin, as, I have observed before, it had in the Greek tongue. This semivowel, for so the Latins seem to acknowledge it, by prefixing e as they do before the other liquids, admitteth after it of the mutes c, p, q, t, as in scapha, spes, squalor, stadium, but none of the liquids, except m, and that chiefly, if not only, in words derived from the Greek tongue. Concerning the intercourse between this, and its neighbour R, see that letter. A.

T, t Latin and English, whereof the former took its figure without any variation from the Greek capital, the latter, with a very small difference, from the lesser Greek character of most common use. They have indeed another small t, but rejected by the Latins, in this form ⅂, which seems rather ornamental than necessary, being chiefly used in conjunction with the other small τ. And as the Latins from the Greeks, so the Greeks borrowed theirs from the ancient Hebrew, namely the Samaritan character of the same form; save that the transverse plank lay not quite on the top of the erect stulp, but across it a little lower, thus, †: which very form is retained still in the smaller form of the Latin, and other cognate languages; in which figure also it was worn on the foreheads of the primitive Christians. This letter is called by the Hebrews תו tau, which signifieth an extremity or bound, because it is the last in their alphabet, as also the last consonant in the Cadmean, and indeed properly the last in the more modern Greek; for φ and χ, which follow, are not properly letters, but notes expressive of two letters, and of no use in the times of the first alphabet, the former being then written by ΠΗ or ΒΗ, the latter by ΚΗ or ΓΗ; which may also be said of ψ, the compendiary note of ΠΣ, ΒΣ, and ΦΣ. In the Latin alphabet only x and z stand after it, the former of which is an abbreviature of ΚΣ, ΓΣ, or ΧΣ; the latter of ΤΣ, ΔΣ, or ΘΣ, as will be showed more fully in the dissertation upon those two letters. To proceed: this letter hath the first place in the third rank of the mutes, which admit of changes into, and perform mutual offices for, one another. These changes are indeed most frequent in the same rank, because nearest in sound to each other. Ex. gr. in the first rank p is only a softer b, and b a harder p, as in scribo, scripsi, scriptum; nubo, nupsi, nuptum: in the second order c a softer g, and g a harder c, as in tego, texi, tectum; jungo, junxi, junctum: which changes are plainly made only for the better sound, the harder mute before a vowel passing into the softer before a consonant; as is likewise done in the first and second conjugation of the Greeks, as in λείβω, λείπσω, λέγω, λέξω. In this third order, indeed, these changes in forming tenses are not frequent in either of these languages, but in derivations of Latin words from Greek such a reciprocation is very common; thus, as from βατῶ and κάτω are derived vado and cado, so vice versâ from ἔνδον and μῦθος are made intus and mutus. The same is observed in Latin derivatives from primitives of the same: thus, as from madeo and video are made matula and vitrum; and as in composition, for the more easy sound, d before t is constantly changed into t, as in attendo, attenuo, and their derivatives; so also from mentior and quatuor come mendax and quadra: and we may add, that our English tongue sometimes softens the Latin d into this letter, as in at, it, what, from ad, id, quid. But as all the orders have a mutual commerce with one another, this letter, though less frequently, and her sisters of the first and second order, correspond: for as terebra comes from τέρετρον, so tussis is from βήσσω; as procerus from πρόσηρος, so lagena from λάγηνα. Nor do these mutual offices between this mute and the sisterhood, hinder her good correspondence with two of the liquids, l and n. For as mitis is from μείλιχος, so volo, are, is from πέλω, πετῶ, as lentiles from τείνω, so penus from πίνος. And there is the same agreement between this letter and the solitary s in Latin words of Greek extraction, where their civilities are only mutual; for as nausea comes from ναυτία, so myrtus from μυρσίνη; but in words purely Greek, t so far intruded into the property of her neighbour s, that the latter was forced to bring her writ of ejectment before the tribunal of the vowels, with a design to hang T on her own gibbet, as Lucian jocosely says; but being nonsuited by the prevailing power of the Athenian eloquence, meditated revenge, and made reprisals by the help of a barbarous nation, who, though they left t in possession, gave her power away to s, in more instances, both in her own and the conquered Roman dominions, than she could pretend her neighbour had invaded her right in, viz. that wherever t came before the third vowel, another vowel following, s, under a very few restrictions, should take her power. And the grammarians, who ought to have oppoſed this uſurpation, confirmed it; and well it was for the Greek tongue, that the Goths underſtood nothing of it, and the grammarians at that time very little; for how abſurd would it have been to have read αἰσία, ὡσίον, for αἴτια, ὤτιον, &c. which would ſeem equally abſurd in Latin, if we did not ſubmit to a barbarous preſcription. But to proceed; this mute admits after it in the beginning of pure Latin words of the liquids very ſeldom any other but r. The ancients indeed in a few words beginning with l, prefixed ſt, as in ſtlites, ſtlocum, for lites, locum, &c. which is now obſolete. But in Greek words, not only l, but m follow t, as in Tlepolemus, tmeſis. In the beginning it takes before it in Greek words c and p, as in Cteſippus, Ptelon; as alſo in the middle of Latin words in different ſyllables, as in factus, captus, as not only the dividing ſuch words requires, but reaſon, for fac and cap are radical, but tus ſervile terminations. V v, the twentieth letter in the Latin alphabet, answers to the sixth Hebrew letter ו, and being conformable to that in power, is both a vowel and consonant; but as to its figure, it was, A. C. 300, or thereabout, thus varied, V, v, u, υ, according to Dr. Bernard, in his Literature of the learned world. In the Hebrew, indeed, the vowel points determine its sound; for they being under it make it a consonant, as in וָו וְלֹא וִישַׁב vau, velo, vishab, but a vowel when over it, as in יוֹם; or in the middle, as in וּבְנֵי ubene. The Greeks admit only this latter use; as also our Saxon ancestors, who commonly substitute f in the place of v, as in fif, seofan, five, seven, as we find in very ancient manuscripts; and sometimes u, as Leui Levi; notwithstanding which they sounded such words words as we do now, otherwise no change of the figure had been made in after times. But though they give this letter no place in their alphabet, they admitted it among their numerals; herein imitating the Greeks, who had made it a numeral only, calling it Βαῦ ἐπίσημον. To begin with the consonant: As to the figure, it is by some thought to be made from the Greek Υ, by cutting off the shank; though the great Scaliger supposed this was rather made from that, by adding the stem: but it seems plain, the reason for this supposition, was his ascribing to the Farnesian monument a higher antiquity than he ought. As to his proof from AYΓVCTOC being found on a Greek coin, it is very weak; because all antiquaries know, that it was not unusual for the Greeks, after they came under the Roman power, to mix Latin letters among their own in coins and inscriptions, especially in Latin words. Marius Victorinus also is against him, and Ausonius expressly saith, Cecropiis ignota viris ferale sonans V. But though it be true that the Greeks had not the letter, yet it is plain that they, at least the Æolians, had the Name, and gave it the same place as a numeral in their units, viz. 6, as it held in the mother alphabet, calling it Βαῦ ἐπίσημον, as likewise Κόππα (90) in their tens, and Σὰν πῖ or (900) in their hundreds; being the only three Hebrew letters, צ, ק, ו, which they had no occasion for in their alphabet Nor had they the name only, but the form also from the Hebrew ו, turning it to the right, and bowing its body, so that its appearance was somewhat like the contracted mark ς, which therefore is now used for it. To proceed, from the name and figure, which are only accidents, to its power, which is the essence of a letter: As it is now pronounced, I think corruptly, it is a mute of the first rank, being of a middle sound between b and f, harder than the former, and softer than the latter, aspirating B, as φ doth Π; and according to Priscian and Donatus, is no other than the Æolian digamma. But if the digamma be the Latin F, as they will have it, and a different power make a different letter, as surely it doth, F and V are two different sounds, and consequently different letters. This is plain from our own tongue, for we neither sound nor write knifes, or lifes, though we do knife and life. I mean, as now pronounced; for it is very likely that before a vowel in the same syllable, both in the primitive and derivative tongues, it had the sound of our w in the same position, as in wall, wen, wine, worm, from vallum, vena, vinum, vermis, Vid. Scal. Not. ad Euseb. & Lips. de L. L. pronunciatione. Yea, in Latin words, after g, q, and s, we give it the sound of w; as in lingva, seqvor, svadeo, where v is melted indeed into the vowel following, but strengthens the sound. That it is not purely a vowel, its resolution into a vowel, frequently made by the poets, seems to evince; as in soluit, Catull. siluæ, Hor. This consonant precedes any vowel in the beginning, middle, or end, of words. It is easily changed into its sister mutes, p and b: for as from ovis comes opilio, from dubius, duvius; so from verpus is made vervex, and from γιλϐὸς, gilvus. Thus much may suffice for the name, figure, and sound of the consonant, in the ancient Latin. We next proceed to the sound of the vowel, as now distinct from the consonant, both in figure and power. The inconvenience of expressing two different sounds by the same letter, was observed by Claudius Cæsar, who endeavoured to remove it, by introducing F the Æolian digamma instead of it; which in publick records obtained a while. But a very useful, though late, invention has applied an effectual remedy, by taking from the former the vocal, and from the latter the consonant, power; so that now U is a vowel when it maketh a syllable alone, or cometh before a consonant in the same syllable: and as such hath a mutual intercourse with all the vowels. For as from κύλιξ cometh calix, from μυδάω madeo; so from κάπηλος proceeds capulus, from κραιπάλη crapula: as from ἴϐηξ ibex, from ἑκυρὸς socer; so from νέφος nubes, from σκόπελος scopulus. As from φύω fio, from στύφω stipo; so from γλία gluten, from χάρις carus; as from ἄγκυρα anchora, from νὺξ nox; so from φῶρ fur, from ἀμοργὴ amurca. As solvit dissolved is soluit, suva silua; so nervus is made from νεῦρον. Nor is it only related to the vowels, but to the diphthongs also. Thus from φαιὸς comes fuscus, from κείρω curro, from λάγυνον lagena, from לג sextarius. By this letter also sometimes the Greek ου is expressed in Latin, as duplus from διπλοῦς, Urania from Οὐρανία, u being equipollent in sound to that diphthong, as Terentianus Maurus has observed, saying, Οὐ literis nostris vacat, quod hunc V compleat satis sonum; which seems rather adapted to the vowel, than the consonant sound of this letter, according to the modern pronunciation. But if we admit, as we before hinted, that V in Latin was sounded as our W, the difference in sound is not so great. In gerunds and participles, this vowel was by the ancients substituted for e; as ad faciundum; mos gerundus est; also in many adjectives of the superlative degree, this custom generally obtained till C. Cæsar's time, when they first began to write by the middle vowel, optimus, maximus, for optumus, maxumus, as we learn from Fabius, l. 1, 7. A.

X x Latin, Ξ ξ Greek. This letter, though both in the alphabetical series and as a numeral, it answers to the Hebrew ס, denoting sixty in that tongue, as this doth in Greek, yet undoubtedly in power comes nearer the harder sound of ש, schin, which probably stood most anciently in this place, till it was usurped by the introduction of the secondary ס. Neither hath it only the power, but the form of ש also; being made by erecting the plane or flat, and turning it to the right, to comply with the western way of writing. The Hebrews call it schin, i. e. a tooth, from its dental figure; and if you prostrate ξ thus ⌢, you will perfectly see the teeth of a saw. The name ξῖ, also, as well as the power and sound, is taken from schin, by removing the last consonant, analogically to what the Greeks did in adopting other letters, or rather by anastrophe, cs for sc. For as from mem and nun, are made my, ny, so from schin is made xi. The Latin letter takes its power, and name indeed, from the Greek; but its form is the same with the capital Greek X Chi, and is sometimes resolved into it, as in ἀχρήνιχΘ-, qu. ἀχρὴ νύξ; and from future tenses in ξω, and præter tenses formed in χα, as πλέκω πέπλεχα, λέξω λέλεχα: and that into this; the Atticks saying διξὰ and τριξὰ, for δίχα and τρίχα. It is a double consonant, compounded of the second order of the mutes κ, γ, χ, and the formative σ; as in πλέκω, πλέξω; λέγω, λέξω; ἔχω, ἕξω. The ancient Atticks long used the single letters, writing πλέκσω, λέγσω, ἔχσω: and the ancient Æolians never used this conjunction, as neither did the Romans universally: for Nigidius Figulus, who, next to Varro, was in greatest reputation for his learning, refused to use it at all, as Victorinus acquainteth us. And Fabius Inst. Or. I. 4. saith, they might have been without it. For all words might have been written as we find apecs, gregs. And Cicero telleth us, it was left out in many words, to give them an easier sound; as in ala, velum, &c. for axilla, vexillum, &c. The later Athenians, on the other hand, used ξ instead of σ, especially in the beginning of words, as tempering the serpentine hiss of σ, which grated upon their ears, as we have shewn in our dissertation on that letter. And the Dorians also imitated them in the end of words; as in ὄρνιξ for ὄρνις, κλὰξ for κλεὶς. The same also they did in the futures, and first aorists of verbs baryton of the fourth conjugation; as in καθίξω, ἐκάθιξα, for καθίσω, ἐκάθισα, &c. On the other hand, the Latins sometimes substituted this letter for the Greek final ς, writing pistrix and Ajax for πίστρις and Αἴας. This double letter in declining nouns, often loseth its s; as in fax, facis; rex, regis; crux, crucis. In numerals it expresseth ten, whence in old Roman manuscripts it is used for denarius, and as such seems to be made of V, and Λ joined, i. e. twice five. Xu, Y, υ, a Greek vowel, the figure whereof Palamedes is said to have taken from the flight of cranes, according to Philostratus; but surely this must be a mistake as to Palamedes, because we find it in the Sigean monument still in being, graven when the Greeks had only the sixteen letters which Cadmus brought into Greece. The two horns, as the old epigram calleth them, or branches, as Persius, were chosen by Pythagoras to demonstrate the easy descent to vice on the left, and the difficult ascent to virtue on the right; from whence it is called his letter. The ancient figure plainly shows, that the Latin V was taken from it, being exactly the same with it in figure. And perhaps V was anciently by the Latins substituted for it, as we see in many words; as in cubus, duo, mus, fus, ruo, &c. from κύβος, δύω, &c. and this they did anciently in words which were afterwards written by the y, as in Musia, Suria, for Mysia, Syria: but instances in these words are fewer. It is certain the Latin V had in many words a deeper sound than the Greek V, and therefore was not the same letter, but nearer to their ου; forasmuch as Βρῦτος, Ἰούνιος, were written by the Greeks for Brutus, Junius: yea the ancient Latins writ ou for u long, as in loumen, joure, for lumen, jure. The Latins have no capital of this letter, because they do not want it: for the Greeks aspirate all words beginning with υ; but the Romans owning an aspiration for a letter, as indeed it is, and always was, with them, prefix h before such words as they take, or borrow, from them, and therefore are all marshalled under it. But the smaller y they have from the Greek Υ, by obliquating its stem, and use it in the middle and end of words, as in Cayster, corymbus; or end, as onyx, martyr. Our mother tongue, in the beginning of words and syllables, admits it as a consonant, as in yarn, yest, yoke, unyoked, but otherwise as a vowel. Vid. Ind.

Z, ζ Greek; Z z when borrowed by the Latins to express Greek words; ז Hebrew. This letter is called a double consonant, whereof the Greeks have three, Ξ, Ψ, and Z: the two former were of later invention, but this stood in the ancient alphabet, as appears by the citation of Pliny, Lib. VII. c. 56, out of Aristotle, notwithstanding the corrupt reading even in the best edition of Pliny, where Ξ is put for Z, and Z for Ξ, as the learned Salmasius observed, and after him the great Spanhemius. This mistake seems purely to have been occasioned by the Roman librarians, who mistook the one for the other. The ancient figure of this letter was ⌶, and by obliquating the perpendicular hath its present form. Its sound, now unknown, was between the Phœnician zain and the Latin G; which, though late, took its original from thence. Hence G is sometimes changed into it, as in ὀλίζον, which the Ionians used for ὀλίγον; and φύζω for φύγω. So the Dorians writ ζεύω for γεύω. The Latins also used indifferently zingiber or gingiber, for the Arabian word written by the Greeks ζιγγίβερι. That this letter had a very sweet sound, is certain from the authority of Dion. Halicarnassus, περὶ συνθέσεως ὀνομάτων. And Fabius supposed that the Roman could never arrive at the sweetness of the Greek elocution, because it wanted y and z, which he calls the sweetest of all their letters, Inst. Or. XII. c. 10. For the same reason, one would think it could not have the sound of a double consonant. For if it were pronounced as the Æolians and Dorians writ σδ, or σδ, as in σδυγὸς for ζυγὸς, σδεύς or σδεύς for ζεύς, τράπεσδα for τράπεζα, &c. it must be very hard, especially when a consonant followed, as ζμερδνὸς, smilaces. Its Hebrew mother ז, is certainly a single consonant, as z is also in our English tongue, where we sometimes join two of them together, as muzzle, puzzle, &c. The Latins likewise often put d or g for this letter, as in nidor, from κνίζα; harpago, from ἁρπάζω. The Greeks change it also into σ, as in the first future tense of the fourth conjugation; or rather exclude it before the formative σ, as in σώζω, σώσω. The Latins indeed often put ss for it, as in patrisso, pitisso, from πατρίζω, πιτίζω: and sometimes also substituted j, as being near in sound to g, as in jugum, from ζυγὸς. In Greek numerals it denoteth VII, though it be only the sixth letter, because ς is interposed in the numerical alphabet.

OF THE ROMAN COINS, WEIGHTS, and MEASURES.

THE Romans reckoned their money by æs, asses, sestertii or nummi, denarii, solidi or aurei, pondo or libra.

Æs, as it denoted a particular coin, was at first libralis, or of a pound weight, and even when it was diminished retained the name of libella. The first impress of this coin was a Janus, and on the reverse the rostrum of a ship.

As was divided into twelve parts, the names of whose divisions were these following: uncia, sextans, quadrans, triens, quincunx, semis, septunx, bes, dodrans, dextans, dejunx.

Quadrans and Teruncius are used to signify the smallest brass coin after the reduction of the as, as the sestertius was the least of the silver coins.

The as was first reduced to two ounces, then to one ounce, and at last to half an ounce.

The sestertius was a silver coin, equal to the fourth part of a denarius.

Nummus, when mentioned as a piece of money, was the same with the sestertius. So mille nummi, mille sestertii, and mille sestertii nummi signify the same; as do likewise mille nummûm, mille sestertiûm, and mille sestertiûm nummûm.

Sestertium in the neutral gender signifies mille sestertiûm nummorum.

The marks of the sestertius nummus are IIS. LLS. HS. HS. which characters denote 2½ asses.

In speaking of sums above a thousand, there is often a twofold eclipsis, sometimes of the word sestertiûm, or its mark; sometimes of the word mille; as in Martial, vi. 10. Pauca Jovem nuper cùm millia (sestertia) fortè rogarem; and vii. 9. Septingenta (millia) Tito debet Lupus. There is another double eclipsis to be observed when they use the numeral Adverbs; as HS bis & tricies in annos singulos Verri decernebatur, quod aratoribus solveret, Cic. Verr. iii. 70. where centena millia is understood, scil. 3,200,000 nummi sestertii, or 3,200 sestertia. If the sum is to be reduced to nummi sestertii then centum and mille both are understood, and that decies or 10 must be multiplied by 100,000. If you would reduce the sum to sestertia, the word centum being then understood, it must be multiplied only by 100. Thus decies HS. is 1,000,000 nummi sestertii, or 1000 sestertia.

Mille sestertii is only 1000 nummi sestertii, in English money 8 l. 1 s. 5½ d. which makes a sestertium.

Mille sestertia is 1000 times that sum, viz. 8072 l. 18 s. 4 d.

Millies HS. is 100,000 times that sum, or 807,291 l. 13 s. 4 d.

When the numbers have a line over them, centena millia is understood, as in the case of the numeral Adverbs; thus HS. $\overline{\text{MC}}$. signifies the same with millies centies HS. that is 110,000,000 nummi, or 888,020 l. 16 s. 8 d. whereas HS. MC. without the cross lines denote only 1100 nummi, or 8 l. 17 s. 7¼ d.

When the numbers are distinguished by points in two or three different orders, the first towards the right hand signifies units, the second thousands, and the third hundred thousands; for instance, III. XII. DC. HS. denotes 300,000, 12,000, and 600 HS. in all making 312,600 nummi, in English money 5047 l. 3 s. 9 d.

Denarius was the chief silver coin among the Romans; in weight, at first, the seventh part of a Roman ounce, which, according to Dr. Arbuthnot, consisted of 438 grains, and was equal to our Avoirdupois ounce; upon which calculation an ounce of silver of that number of grains would be in value 4 s. 6¾ d.

The subdivisions of the denarius were the quinarius, or half, so called from its value of five asses; and likewise victoriatus, from the image of Victory sometimes impressed upon it; and the sestertius, which has been mentioned already.

The pondo argenti amongst the Romans, is a sort of numeral expression of sums of money, and is different from the common libra, which consisted only of 84 denarii, or 96 drachms. The pondo, according to Budæus's valuation, amounts to the value of an Attick Mina, or 3 l. 4 s. 7 d. according to Agricola, to 3 l. 2 s.

The

The Value and Proportion of the ROMAN COINS.

						l.	s.	d.	q.
					Teruncius	0	0	0	0 $\frac{775}{1000}$
2					Sembella	0	0	0	1 $\frac{55}{100}$
4	2				Libella, As	0	0	0	3 $\frac{1}{10}$

20	10	5	2		Quinarius, Victoriatus	0	0	3	3 $\frac{1}{2}$
40	20	10	4	2	Denarius	0	0	7	3

Note, Of these the denarius, victoriatus, sestertius, and sometimes the as, were of silver; the rest of brass.
There were sometimes also coined of brass the triens, sextans, uncia, sextula, and dupondius.

	l.	s.	d.
The Roman gold coin was the aureus, which weighed generally double the denarius; which, according to the first proportion of coinage mentioned by Pliny, Lib. xxxii. 3. was worth	1	4	3 $\frac{1}{4}$
According to the proportion that obtains now amongst us	1	0	9
According to the decuple proportion mentioned by Livy, and Jul. Pollux	0	12	11
According to the proportion mentioned by Tacitus, and which afterwards obtained; whereby the aureus exchanged for 25 denarii	0	16	1 $\frac{3}{4}$

Some alterations of the value of the Roman coin mentioned by Pliny:

In the reign of Servius } the as weighed of brass { 1 pound
A. Urb. 490 } the as weighed of brass { 2 ounces
A. Urb. 537 } the as weighed of brass { 1 ounce
